Local Investment Professional earns new Certified College Planning Specialist certification

Danielle Lambousis, an accountant with Ronald A. Mermer, CPA, PC, has attained the Certified College Planning Specialist (CCPS) certification from the National Institute of Certified College Planners. There are fewer than 500 Certified College Planning Specialists in the country.

“Financial planners and investment advisers that have made the investment in time, education, and training to become genuine experts in college planning deserve special recognition,” says Rick Darvis, CPA, one of the nation’s preeminent experts on planning for college. “The CCPS certification helps to distinguish those professionals that have made that commitment.”

The National Institute of Certified College Planners (www.niccp.com) restricts the CCPS certification to registered investment advisors, licensed securities agents, CPAs, attorneys, and other higher education professionals that assist families in preparing for the financial cost of sending children to college. The organization provides educational resources and support to CCPS candidates and designees, including training and testing in the areas of paying for college, saving for college, and advanced college funding strategies.

Danielle Lambousis can be contacted directly at 845-897-5108 or danielle@mermcipas.com.

The National Institute of Certified College Planners (NICCP) is dedicated solely to the administration and maintenance of the Certified College Planning Specialist (CCPS) certification program. The NICCP web site www.niccp.com features a listing of all current and active CCPS designees. The mission of the NICCP is to advance the principles of financial planning for higher education through providing recognition and support to those experienced financial professionals who devote a large portion of their practices to helping families plan financially for college.
